Description

Kiplea Copse is an attractive mature mixed woodland, mainly native broadleaved trees such as oak, beech, birch, sycamore, ash and wych elm, with a sprinkling of conifers mixed in, particularly towards the eastern boundary.

In the northern part of the wood, there's quite a lot of coppiced hazel and wych elm beneath the tall canopy and a rich ground flora of dog's mercury, arum lilies, primroses and native ferns. A few old fallen trees make great deadwood habitat for woodland wildlife, the leathery bark of birch trunks outlasting the timber. Wildlife habitat is further enhanced with a few of the large trees having a covering of ivy.

Towards the south-eastern corner, a bench is located on the level, just before the land drops away slightly, close to some oak and beech trees. Ash, in this area of the wood could yield a fantastic home firewood supply or material for crafts. A small area in the south-western corner has recently been cut back where an electrical line crosses the wood boundary and there's already logs ready to stack to season.

Along the southern and eastern boundaries are old hedge shrubs such as elder, blackthorn, hawthorn and willow with farm fields beyond and pleasant views out.

The purchasers of the woodland will be asked to enter into a covenant to ensure the quiet and peaceful enjoyment of adjoining woodlands and meadows.

Roe deer pass through the wood and you may notice their trails or the scraped beds where they rest up at night.

Local area and history

A Heritage Lottery funded archaeology project, undertaken in 2014, explored the area around Kiplin, which was recorded as 'Chipeling' in the Domesday survey of 1086. Through the millennia before the township of Chipeling existed, the area was home to prehistoric hunter-gatherers, early farmers and invading Romans who founded the town of Catterick. Later there were Saxon kings and warriors, and medieval monks farmed the land at Kiplin and milled grain to support nearby Easby Abbey and each era has left fragments of the past behind.

With an interest in archaeology, The Earl and Countess of Tyrconnel of Kiplin Hall, supported the discovery of late Bronze Age, Roman and Saxon objects on the estate, in the first part of the nineteenth century, including three late Bronze Age gold torque-shaped bracelets.
